The International Classification of Crime for Statistical Purposes (ICCS) was developed using the “Principles and framework for an international classification of crimes for statistical purposes” produced by the UNECE-UNODC Joint Task Force on Crime Classification and endorsed by the Conference of European Statisticians in 2012. The ICCS was produced on the basis of the plan to finalize by 2015 an international classification of crime for statistical purposes, as approved by the Statistical Commission in its decision 44/110 and by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 2013/37.

Gratitude is expressed to all Member States, international organizations and individual experts who contributed to the development of the ICCS. The continuous support of the UNODC-INEGI Center of Excellence on Statistics on Governance, Public Safety, Victimization and Justice is gratefully acknowledged, as is the contribution of Steven Malby who developed the initial concept of the classification. UNODC would also like to thank the United Nations Statistics Division and the members of its Expert Group on International Statistical Classifications for their valuable comments and contributions during the peer-review process.

Part One – Introduction

I. Overview

The nature and purpose of the International Classification of Crime for Statistical Purposes

The International Classification of Crime for Statistical Purposes (ICCS) is a classification of criminal offences which is based on internationally agreed concepts, definitions and principles in order to enhance the consistency and international comparability of crime statistics, and improve analytical capabilities at both the national and international levels.¹

The ICCS provides a framework for the systematic production and comparison of statistical data across different criminal justice institutions and jurisdictions. This means that the ICCS is applicable to all forms of crime data, whatever the stage of the criminal justice process (police, prosecution, conviction, imprisonment) at which they are collected, as well as to data collected in crime victimization surveys.

At the international level, the ICCS improves the comparability of crime data between countries. Standardized concepts and definitions allow for the systematic collection, analysis and dissemination of data, and also respond to the demand for in-depth research and analysis of transnational crime. At the national level, the ICCS can be used as a model to provide structure and organize statistical data that are often produced according to legal rather than analytical categories. Moreover, the ICCS can harmonize data across domestic criminal justice institutions (police, prosecutions, courts, prisons) and across different data sources (administrative records and statistical surveys).² Likewise, the ICCS can be used as a tool to standardize data from sub-national entities that may have different statistical systems or legal frameworks.

The need for an international classification of crime

Reliable crime statistics are critical for measuring changes in crime levels, monitoring state responses to crime, evaluating policies and understanding the various facets of crime in different contexts. Often, raw data from different stages of the criminal justice process are available, but the purposeful collection and organization of these data into statistical form is required to produce valuable information for use in decision-making. The comparison of crime statistics across time, between countries or with other available statistics is particularly difficult due to the lack of standardized concepts and the absence of an internationally agreed statistical framework to make such comparisons possible.³

² United Nations Economic and Social Council. Statistical Commission. Report of the National Institute of Statistics and Geography of Mexico and the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime on a road map to improve the quality and availability of crime statistics at the national and international levels (19 December 2012). E/CN.3/2013/11.

³ Other factors affecting the comparability of crime statistics refer to the fact that only a varying proportion of criminal offences are reported and recorded by public authorities and to the use of different practices to produce statistical counts of crimes. For a review see Annex 1 (see also: United Nations Economic and Social Council. Statistical Commission. Report of the National Institute of Statistics and Geography of Mexico on crime statistics. E/CN.3/2012/3).

To illustrate, various data sources, often within the same jurisdiction, use different definitions and concepts to organize crime data which are often based on legal rather than statistical principles.⁴ This close and intertwined relationship between legislation and statistics creates problems from an analytical perspective: statistical data are often organized and categorized according to legal provisions, such as articles in legal or penal codes, which are not always relevant from an analytical standpoint. Furthermore, comparability across time and jurisdictions can be hampered by changes in legislation and, for example, by the fact that the same act can be criminalized under very different legal provisions in different countries, or may be considered a criminal offence in one country but not in another.

The ICCS addresses these issues by providing a methodological and statistical standard and a common definitional framework to improve data quality and comparability. Offences are grouped in a meaningful and systematic way, resulting in an improvement in the capability to produce, disseminate and analyse crime data accurately in order to inform the public and tailor policies and programmes in the areas of crime prevention, rule of law and criminal justice reform.

The challenge of developing an international classification of crime for a nationally defined event

Currently, national statistics on crime refer to criminal offences as defined by each country's criminal law system. Without legal harmonization, differences in the definition of offences are inevitable and international comparison must always be placed in the context of these differences. For example, one country may require physical contact for an offence to be considered an assault, while another country may not.

In order to overcome such challenges, the approach used by the ICCS is to consider "criminal" acts in national and international laws as the universe of acts that are subject to classification within the ICCS. However, the specific classification of such acts (i.e. their allocation to analytical categories) is based on behavioural descriptions rather than strictly legal specifications derived from criminal laws. Crimes as defined in criminal law are typically associated with actions or behavioural and contextual attributes that are universally considered to be an offence (for example, wounding or injuring, or taking property without consent). This event-based approach avoids issues created by legal complexities, resulting in a simplified and globally applicable classification.

It is important to note that the ICCS uses specific terms, such as "rape", "harassment" or "burglary", which are widely recognized and defined in criminal legislation. These terms are given a specific description in the ICCS, which is intended to be used for statistical purposes. The adoption of the ICCS at the national level will require the attentive translation of offences as defined by national legislation into ICCS categories, with careful consideration of the full act/event descriptions and explanatory notes.

The process of building the international classification of crime

The Social Commission of the United Nations first highlighted the importance of preparing a standard classification of offences in 1951.⁵ However, successive endeavours to develop such an international crime classification were fraught with challenges due to disparities in definitions, national legislations and reporting systems.

Concrete steps to overcome such limitations were made in 2009 when the Conference of European Statisticians established a Task Force, led by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) and the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe (UNECE), to develop a crime classification framework based on behavioural descriptions rather than legal codes.⁶ The framework of the first international crime classification was developed by the Task Force and approved by the Conference of European Statisticians at the 60th plenary session in June 2012.⁷

The proposal to develop a full international crime classification was discussed at the 43rd session of the United Nations Statistical Commission (UNSC)⁸ and the 21st session of the United Nations Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice (CCPCJ).⁹ At the next session of both UNSC and CCPCJ, both Commissions approved the plan to develop an international classification of crime for statistical purposes,¹⁰ in consultation with statisticians and experts from national statistical offices, other national government institutions and regional and international organizations.

Three consultation meetings were held between 2012 and 2014, and two large-scale testing exercises of successive versions of the ICCS were also undertaken in the same period.¹¹ Both testing exercises confirmed the feasibility of developing and implementing the ICCS, with a view to gradually applying it to statistics produced at the national level. A final draft version of the ICCS was sent to Member States

Among other issues, the meeting analysed the results of a first testing of the draft classification framework among 16 volunteer countries. The second consultation meeting took place in February 2013 in Vienna and was attended by representatives from 18 countries in Africa, the Americas, Asia and Europe, as well as representatives from international organizations and research institutes. The third and final consultation meeting in the form of an Expert Group Meeting held in Vienna in May 2014 was attended by representatives from 31 countries in Africa, the Americas, Asia and Europe, and representatives from international organizations and research institutes. This meeting reviewed an advanced version of the ICCS that was informed in turn by the results of a second comprehensive testing exercise, which took place in 2014 with the participation of 41 volunteer countries (of which 6 were from Africa, 7 from Asia, 7 from the Americas, 19 from Europe and 2 from Oceania). and other relevant organizations by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) and the United Nations Statistical Division in August 2014.¹²

At its 46th session in March 2015 the United Nations Statistical Commission endorsed the ICCS as an international statistical standard for data collection, both from administrative records and survey generated data, and as an analytical tool to elicit unique information on crime drivers and factors. The SC also confirmed UNODC as the custodian of the ICCS and endorsed the implementation plan for the classification at national, regional and international levels, including the creation of a technical advisory group to provide substantive advice and support to the maintenance of the ICCS.¹³

Developed with the active participation and collaboration of experts from several countries, who participated in the expert group meetings and testing exercises and provided inputs and comments, the present version of the ICCS is the result of extensive consultations and collaboration between national statistical offices, other national government institutions, regional and international organizations, including UNODC, the UNODC-INEGI Center of Excellence (COE) on Statistics on Governance, Public Safety, Victimization and Justice, the World Health Organisation (WHO), the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), Eurostat, the Inter-American Development Bank (IADB) and the Organisation of American States (OAS). Furthermore, the ICCS has been reviewed by the Expert Group on International Statistical Classifications, the central coordinating body of the work on international classifications established by the United Nations Statistical Commission.

¹² Final comments were received from 44 Member States (2 from Africa, 9 from the Americas, 13 from Asia, 19 from Europe and 1 from Oceania) and 6 international organizations and addressed in the final review of the classification.

II. Principles used in the ICCS

The definition of crime for the purposes of the ICCS

While certain common elements, such as “harm” and “wrongfulness”, can be associated with crime, they cannot wholly and operationally define it. Moreover, the vast disparity in approaches and sources used in the establishment of criminal laws by different countries makes it impossible to create a consistent and comprehensive definition of crime. The common denominator of what constitutes a “crime” is that it consists of behaviours which are defined as criminal offences and are punishable as such by law. The offences defined as criminal are established by each country’s legal system and the codification of crimes (criminal code, penal code, etc.).

As a result, “crime” is considered by the ICCS to be the punishable contravention or violation of the limits on human behaviour as imposed by national criminal legislation. Each criminal offence has a perpetrator — person, corporation or institution — which is liable for the criminal behaviour in question.

The unit of classification of the ICCS

The unit of classification¹⁴ of the ICCS is the act that constitutes a criminal offence. The description of the criminal offence is provided in terms of the behaviour shown by the perpetrator(s) of a crime. The apparent behaviour is in most cases sufficient to define an offence for the purposes of the ICCS, while in some cases additional elements need to be taken into account, such as the intentionality (state of mind) of the perpetrator or the condition/status of the victim (for example, whether he/she is a minor); in other cases, a crime is defined by a sequence of behaviours, as in the case of trafficking in persons, for example.¹⁵

Defining and classifying the type of crime event is the primary focus of the classification, which aims to assign all criminal offences to categories on the basis of a number of criteria (see section: “The criteria used to build the ICCS”). The ICCS also provides for a number of additional attributes of the crime event, which, though not determinant of the nature of the crime, are very important additions that provide analytical insight to statistical data on crime, such as selected characteristics of victims or perpetrators (see section: “Disaggregating variables as additional descriptors of criminal offences”).

Besides classifying criminal offences, the ICCS can also be used in relation to other events or conditions related to the criminal justice process, such as arrests, prosecutions, convictions and prison sentences, as well as persons involved as perpetrators or victims. If consistently used by all relevant data sources, the ICCS can measure the flows and links between the different stages of the criminal justice system. For example, if the ICCS is applied at all stages of the criminal justice process, links can be made between data on a given offence (whether from administrative data or from victimization surveys), the number of arrests for the same type of offence and, in sequence, on prosecutions, convictions and on persons in prison for the same type of offence.

¹⁴ The classification unit is the basic unit to be classified in the classification (e.g. in an activity classification this would be the establishment or enterprise, in an occupational classification it would be the job). The application of the principles of statistical classification

The ICCS is based on established statistical practices and principles. By definition, a statistical classification is: “A set of discrete, exhaustive and mutually exclusive categories which can be assigned to one or more variables used in the collection and presentation of data, and which describe the characteristics of a particular population”.¹⁶ Particular care has been taken that the following core characteristics of an international statistical classification have been implemented in the ICCS:

Mutual exclusivity: every elementary manifestation of the phenomenon under study should be assigned to one and only one category of the classification such that there are no overlaps

Application of the principle of mutual exclusivity: the ICCS can be used to classify every offence into one and only one category of the classification with no overlaps. The description of each category clearly defines the respective event/behaviour with additional guidance provided by legal inclusions and exclusions (examples of criminal offences in national legislation that are respectively included in, or excluded from, that category), which will further clarify the boundaries of each category.

The use of additional crime disaggregations or “tags” (explained in more detail below) provides a method to deal with cases that could be attributed to one offence or another. For example, a fraud offence perpetrated through the use of a computer is classified as a fraud with a cybercrime-related tag. Similarly, a trafficking in persons offence perpetrated by an organized criminal group is classified as trafficking in persons with an organized crime tag.

Exhaustiveness: every possible manifestation of the phenomenon under study should be included in the classification

Application of the principle of exhaustiveness: while the ICCS aims to cover every manifestation of crime, it is clear that this principle needs to be adopted with due consideration as to what is feasible. The sheer number of acts criminalized in statutes, regulatory provisions and judicial decisions in any given country, as well as continuous legislative changes, hamper any attempt to build a comprehensive listing of all criminal offences that exist globally. A realistic goal for the classification is thus to capture acts or events generally known to constitute criminal offences in a sufficient number of countries, at a certain level of detail, determined by carefully balancing the classification for practicality and policy-relevance at an international level. In addition, the ICCS does not include classification categories for events that generally constitute administrative offences (such as minor traffic violations).

As such, the ICCS also includes some events or behaviours that are criminalized in some countries while being legal in others. In a small number of cases, the criminalization of certain acts has been held to contravene international human rights law.¹⁷ In such cases, it is important to note that the ICCS should not be viewed as supporting or legitimizing the criminalization of any offence presented within the classification, but be taken as a statistical standard that attempts to provide realistic, global coverage of every manifestation of crime for statistical purposes.

ESA/STAT/AC.267/5 of 6 May 2013. Available at: <http://unstats.un.org/unsd/class/intercop/expertgroup/2013/AC267-5.PDF>.

¹⁷ See, for example, Concluding observations of the UN Human Rights Committee: CCPR/CO/79/LKA (abortion); [CCPR/C/SDN/CO/3 (apostasy)]; CCPR/C/UZB/CO/3 (proselytism)]; CCPR/C/PHL/CO/4 (libel and defamation).

Statistical feasibility: it is possible to effectively, accurately and consistently distinguish between the categories in the classification on the basis of the information available

Application of the principle of statistical feasibility: the statistical feasibility of a statistical classification means that observations can be allocated to categories in the classification on the basis of the information available; for example, on the basis of responses to questions that can be reasonably asked in statistical surveys or on administrative forms.¹⁸ The ICCS supports this by carefully defining the criminal act on the basis of behavioural descriptions, supplemented with examples of legal inclusions and exclusions for each category.

Statistical feasibility was tested on the basis of existing data collections of a significant number of countries which participated in testing subsequent draft versions of the ICCS by allocating data on criminal offences to the categories of the classification (see section: “The process of building the international classification of crime”).

The criteria used to build the ICCS

Criminal offences can be seen, and classified, from a multitude of angles: their impact on victims, the way they have been perpetrated, the offender’s motive and the seriousness of the offence, to name but a few. In building the classification, priority has been given to criteria which are particularly relevant from a policy perspective: the ICCS categories, and the data produced accordingly, should provide information that can be easily understood and used when developing crime prevention and criminal justice policies. For example, data organized along the lines of the ICCS should provide answers to questions on trends and comparisons regarding acquisitive crime, or crime of a sexual nature, or on more complex constructs such as financial crime or offences committed by organized criminal groups. A number of criteria have been used to build the hierarchical structure of the ICCS, in the attempt to build categories that can respond to a variety of information needs. In particular, the following criteria have been used to form categories of the ICCS:

- policy area of the act/event (protection of property rights, protection of health, etc.)
- target of the act/event (e.g. person, object, natural environment, State, etc.)
- seriousness of the act/event (e.g. acts leading to death, acts causing harm, etc.)
- means by which the act/event is perpetrated (e.g. by violence, threat of violence, etc.).

Based on these criteria,¹⁹ criminal offences can be grouped in homogenous categories, which are aggregated at four different hierarchical levels: Levels 1, 2, 3 and 4.²⁰ There are 11 Level 1 categories designed to cover all acts or events that constitute a crime within the scope of the ICCS. Criminal offences at Levels 2, 3 and 4 can be summed to provide observations at more aggregated levels, while observations at higher levels can be subdivided into lower-level categories.²¹

¹⁸ See, Andrea Hancock, op. cit., p.9.

¹⁹ The four criteria are applied on the basis of the policy-relevance of particular groupings without an overall priority of one over the other.

²⁰ As specific nomenclature, Level 1 may also be referred to as Sections, Level 2 as Divisions, Level 3 as Groups and Level 4 as Classes.

²¹ United Nations. Statistical Division. UN Glossary of Classification Terms. "Group". Available at: http://unstats.un.org/unsd/class/family/glossary_short.asp. For reasons of clarity and space, categories at the higher levels that are not further disaggregated are not repeated at the lower levels.

Criminal offences can be identified at the level of detail that is of interest. The ICCS has also been designed with a view to being a flexible tool to create “meta-categories”. If needed, categories can be aggregated across categories at different levels. For example, Level 1 category “Acts against property involving violence or threat against a person” can be aggregated with Level 1 category “Acts against property only” to form a new meta-category “Acts against property”.

The numerical coding of the categories is in accordance with their level in the classification: Level 1 categories are the broadest categories and have a two-digit code (e.g. 01); Level 2 categories have a four-digit code (e.g. 0101); Level 3 categories have a five-digit code (e.g. 01011); and Level 4 categories, the most detailed level, have a six-digit code (e.g. 010111).

LEVEL 1 CATEGORIES
1	Acts leading to death or intending to cause death
2	Acts leading to harm or intending to cause harm to the person
3	Injurious acts of a sexual nature
4	Acts against property involving violence or threat against a person
5	Acts against property only
6	Acts involving controlled psychoactive substances or other drugs
7	Acts involving fraud, deception or corruption
8	Acts against public order, authority and provisions of the State
9	Acts against public safety and state security
10	Acts against the natural environment
11	Other criminal acts not elsewhere classified

In particular, the 11 categories in Level 1 have been chosen based on all the four criteria above, as well as by giving due attention to categories often used in national data, on the grounds of facilitating the practical implementation of the ICCS. The same criteria are used to identify categories at Levels 2, 3 and 4. For example, based on the target of an act/event, sexual exploitation is disaggregated into sexual exploitation of adults and sexual exploitation of children. Sexual exploitation of children is further disaggregated into four Level 4 categories based on policy relevance: child pornography; child prostitution; sexual grooming of children; and other sexual exploitation of children.

The categories in Levels 1, 2 and 3 of the ICCS are intended to be complete and to encompass every possible criminal offence. However, not all Level 2 and 3 categories are further divided into Level 4 categories since the latter are not always necessary to identify policy-relevant offences.

All categories at each level of the classification are described in detailed terms. Each offence has an act- or event-based description, which is the core set of actions, behavioural and contextual attributes that define the offence. Descriptions are accompanied by legal inclusions and exclusions to identify the most common or important criminal offences included in, or excluded from, the category. For example, the ICCS defines negligence through the core behavioural actions: the failure to exercise the care towards others which a reasonable or prudent person would exert under the circumstances; or taking action that a reasonable person would not take. Furthermore, negligence in situations of persons under care is defined with the addition of contextual attributes — in this case, the victim — as behavioural attributes alone cannot define acts that are criminalized separately (often with a higher penalty) due to the specific vulnerability of the target of the act, rather than the overall behaviour itself.

Disaggregating variables as additional descriptors of criminal offences

The categories of the ICCS capture and describe the nature of criminal offences, but a number of other characteristics are also essential to enable the full identification of policy-relevant patterns and trends in crime and to conduct comprehensive and detailed analyses. For example, when producing statistics on intentional homicide, additional value is provided if data can be disaggregated by the characteristics of the victims and the perpetrators, by the use of firearms or by motives for killings. To this end, additional disaggregating variables (also called “tags”) that enable the coding of additional information about an offence are provided, which helps to enrich the analysis with specific event, victim and perpetrator characteristics related to any particular crime.

In the current practice of national crime recording systems, the number, structure and application of such additional disaggregating variables to datasets on crime and criminal justice statistics vary greatly, and are often determined by factors such as specific policy needs; recording and processing capacities at the local, regional and national levels of data collection; the level of development and sophistication of the national crime statistics system; and the degree of automation and digitalization of data collection. In particular, the last of these criteria (i.e. whether it is a paper or a computer-based system) determines if a national crime statistics system can support a comprehensive structure of disaggregating variables.

In systems where data collection, transmission and aggregation are automated through electronic data capture, storage, transfer and compilation, it is more likely that data are organized in a way which allows for the capture and retrieval of every possible detail. For example, all relevant details of a criminal offence, such as the characteristics of the perpetrator and victim, can be captured and stored electronically in a unit record. Multiple types of statistical outputs can then be obtained, for example, by disaggregating data on individual offences by selected disaggregating variables (for example, corruption offences by economic sector or trafficking in persons by citizenship of the victims) or by using disaggregating variables in combination with several crime categories (for example, by considering the sex and age of victims of all “violent offences” or the geographical location of all “property crimes”).

The system of disaggregating variables is thus an additional tool for use in a comprehensive system of crime and criminal justice statistics, the realization of which relies heavily on the existence of an automated data collection system.

A large number of event, victim and perpetrator characteristics could theoretically be of interest in different parts of the world. For practical reasons, not all possible disaggregations can be mentioned in the ICCS.²² Nevertheless, in cases where a system of disaggregating variables is implemented or is planned to be implemented in the future, it is beneficial to apply a harmonized set of basic policy-relevant characteristics of crimes, perpetrators and victims for analytical and comparative purposes. For example, using the same disaggregations for data on the victim-perpetrator relationship (such as current intimate partner/spouse, former intimate partner/spouse, blood relative, etc.) would greatly assist the cross-national analysis of patterns and trends in violent crime and its enabling and mitigating factors. Based on their policy relevance, the supplementary table to the ICCS indicates that the following minimum set of disaggregating variables should be applied to criminal offences where relevant:

- event descriptions: degree of completion, type of weapon used, situational context, geographical location, date and time, type of location, motive, cybercrime-related, reporting entity;
- victim descriptions: sex, age, age status, citizenship, legal status, economic sector (of victimized businesses), intoxication status;
- perpetrator descriptions: sex, age, age status, victim-perpetrator relationship, citizenship, legal status, intoxication status, repeat offender.

The proposed system of disaggregating variables can be implemented by national crime recording institutions in a number of different ways. A comprehensive statistical solution would integrate at least the minimum set of disaggregating variables in the template used for (electronic) unit records of any type of crime, thus allowing a full analysis of any offence, perpetrator or victim by any relevant combination of disaggregating variable required.²³ A more limited option, for example, would be the collection of only certain perpetrator or victim characteristics for all crimes (separate counts for juvenile perpetrators, for example) while an interim option would be the collection of an expanded number of event, perpetrator and victim characteristics on a few core crimes only (such as homicide, robbery or trafficking in persons).

Given the specific value of data on intentional homicide, due to the gravity of the crime and its impact on the wider community, additional disaggregating variables which provide a higher level of detail about the situational context, social relationships and killing mechanism are necessary to describe this offence (see below).

For any available dataset, further data descriptors should be made available to facilitate the interpretation of statistical data. While most of the crimes, and their statistical reporting, refer to offences actually committed by one or more direct perpetrators (whether known or not), data can also include cases of threats to commit a certain crime or when the offence consisted of planning or assisting others to commit it. It is therefore important that information be provided about whether available data on criminal offences (and perpetrators) include or exclude the following behaviours in the counts for the categories:

- threats to commit the crime
- aiding/abetting/accessory to the crime
- accomplice to the crime
- conspiracy/planning the crime
- incitement to commit the crime.

This information should ideally be captured and stored for every criminal offence to indicate whether the recorded event refers to a threat, a case of aiding/abetting/accessory to the crime or any other typology in the list above. In such cases, the desired statistical outputs can be produced by either including or ²³ Not all “tags” are applicable to all crime types (e.g. “attempted” does not apply to negligent homicide; “type of weapon used” or “motive” do not apply to theft or fraud; and “age of victim” does not apply to illegal logging). Consequently, only a certain part of the resulting combinations will be sensible and policy-relevant.

excluding such events from the aggregate counts. Alternatively, the information on the inclusion of such cases can be provided at an aggregated level of crime categories, in the form of meta-data.

Intentional homicide as a special case

The study of intentional homicide is relevant not only because of the gravity of the offence, but also because intentional homicide is one of the most measurable and comparable indicators for monitoring violent deaths and is often considered both a proxy for violent crime as well as an indicator of levels of security within countries. According to the ICCS, intentional homicide is “unlawful death inflicted upon a person with the intent to cause death or serious injury.” Such a definition provides clear guidance for the determination of whether a specific act of killing is to be considered intentional homicide for the purpose of producing statistics.

However, in some cases, contextual circumstances also have to be taken into account when determining whether, for statistical purposes, certain killings have to be included in the count of homicides. This occurs for killings during situations of collective violence — such as during armed conflicts, or in situations of civil unrest — where it is important to distinguish between different types of killings, as the context can determine if and how such acts should be coded in the ICCS. Although producing statistical data in such situations can be very challenging, it is nonetheless important to provide guidance on which killings should be considered within the ICCS and about how to classify them for the purpose of producing internationally consistent statistics on homicide.

Killings during civil unrest

Killings during civil unrest are those which occur during a situation of violent hostilities between two or more parties that does not amount to an internal armed conflict,²⁴ and may include riots or other sporadic acts of violence linked to strikes or protests/demonstrations that turn violent. As these situations do not usually amount to internal armed conflict, and thus are not to be considered within the legal framework in force during conflicts, each violent death that occurs during a situation of civil unrest should be classified according to the same standards applicable to intentional homicide. This means that each killing needs to be examined and attributed to the applicable type according to the factual circumstances, based on whether, for example, the killing was unlawful and intentional. When such killings are classified as intentional homicides in the ICCS, there is the option to use the disaggregating variable tag for intentional homicides, “Situational Context — Related to civil unrest”, which allows for the statistical identification of the situational context in which killings of this nature take place (see Table: III).

Killings during armed conflict

International humanitarian law distinguishes between two types of armed conflict:²⁵ (1) international armed conflicts, which exist wherever there is a resort to armed force between States;²⁶ and (2) non-international armed conflicts (or internal armed conflict), which occur whenever there is protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups within a State.²⁷

While the first type of conflict is largely related to armed actions perpetrated by the military forces of States, non-international armed conflicts are more difficult to define and identify. In particular, in the continuum of situations of collective violence within a country, it is important to distinguish situations of civil unrest from those of internal armed conflict. The elements that determine the difference are the threshold of intensity of hostilities (whether hostilities are of a collective character, or whether the Government uses military force rather than police force against insurgents), and the degree of organization of the group (whether the armed group is sufficiently organized, with a command structure, headquarters and the ability to plan and carry out military operations). In situations of armed conflict, the following types of killings should be classified within the ICCS:

- in situations of armed conflict, any targeted or excessive killing by a combatant (acting in association with or in the context of the conflict) of a civilian taking no active part in the hostilities can be recorded as a war crime in 11013 (Other criminal acts not elsewhere classified; Acts under universal jurisdiction; War crimes);
- in situations of armed conflict, the killing of combatants by other combatants which is in breach of international humanitarian law can also be coded to 11013; for example, wilful killing of parties to the conflict that are hors de combat,²⁸
- a killing perpetrated by a combatant which is not directly in association with the armed conflict, or by a civilian taking no active part in hostilities in a situation of armed conflict should not be considered as associated with the conflict, and should be analysed as any other killing, irrespective of the conflict situation, and classified into the existing typologies of violent death according to the standard definitions;
- killing by a combatant which is considered a criminal offence in the national legislation (and is prosecuted as such) but does not amount to a war crime, should be classified under 0107 (Unlawful killing associated with armed conflict).

These standards can be very challenging to apply when there is a lack of operational capabilities to measure and identify different killings, and, indeed, in situations of collective violence a large share of killings may remain unreported. However, in the case of killings that are recorded, establishing strict boundaries for this ambiguous field will help to distinguish intentional homicide from other killings and increase data quality and comparability around the world.

Additional disaggregations of intentional homicide

Once it has been established whether a particular act of killing is to be classified and counted as an intentional homicide, there is often a need for more detailed quantitative information on the social contexts and mechanisms of intentional homicide that can help to design better evidence-based policies for preventing and responding to this particular type of crime. For comparative and analytical purposes, three classification criteria are particularly relevant for the characterization of intentional homicide and can be used to define it in more detail.²⁹ These three criteria (Situational context; Relationship between victim and perpetrator; and Mechanism of killing) have been used to build three additional disaggregation tables that are applicable for intentional homicide only (see Tables III, IV and V).

III. Application of the ICCS

Classifying offences for the purpose of the ICCS

To implement the ICCS it is necessary to properly allocate any given offence to one of the ICCS categories. This requires knowledge of the ICCS structure before attempting to classify offences. As previously mentioned, the ICCS is a hierarchical classification and the first step is to identify which Level 1 category is the most relevant to the particular offence in question. To allow easy reference to the appropriate category, each Level 1 category is defined by the broad actions, attributes or events that it encompasses. For example, all acts leading to death or intending to cause death are classified under Level 1 category 01.³⁰ Similarly, all injurious acts of a sexual nature are classified under Level 1 category 03.

It is then necessary to classify an offence into a Level 2, 3 or 4 category. This can be done by identifying the shorthand name in criminal legislation, such as rape, consulting the act/event-based definitions, and following guidance from the legal inclusions and exclusions. Guidance from all elements of the ICCS is necessary to classify an offence correctly. The use of shorthand names alone is insufficient as the meaning and definition of shorthand terms may be different from those used in national legal systems and may even vary between jurisdictions within countries.³¹

There are residual categories represented by the word “other” in the category name (i.e. other acts of fraud) for cases in which an offence cannot be classified in an established category. Offences should be classified into these residual categories as sparingly as possible and only upon a thorough review of the full classification to ensure that a category is not overlooked.

The implementation of the ICCS at the national level will be a gradual process, which will require attentive mapping of national criminal offences into the ICCS framework. National correspondence tables between the ICCS and national crime classifications will facilitate ICCS implementation at the country level. To support the process, UNODC will develop additional tools and supporting documents, including an implementation manual to facilitate the mapping of national crime data into the ICCS structure. The planned implementation manual will consist of different volumes to address the mapping of national administrative crime statistics systems into the ICCS; the mapping of victimization survey data into the ICCS; and the counting of rules and coding issues.

²⁹ In addition to (completed) intentional homicide, these additional classification criteria can be equally applied to attempted intentional homicide.

³⁰ With the exception of crimes classified as war crimes, genocide or crimes against humanity classified under Level 1 category 11 Acts under universal jurisdiction.

The use of legal inclusions and exclusions in the ICCS

Inclusions

Each category has a list of inclusions or examples of offences or acts/events to be classified in that category. These are not sub-categories but common offences belonging to the respective category listed, with the aim of providing practical guidance in the allocation of offences and of distinguishing the boundary between one category and another.³² For example, the inclusions under Trade or possession of protected or prohibited species of fauna and flora (1003) stipulate that trafficking in wildlife and unlawful trade or possession of wildlife are some of the offences that belong to this category. Inclusions are not exhaustive and the list of inclusions can be further expanded in the future.

Exclusions

Most categories also have a list of exclusions or examples of offences or acts/elements that are classified elsewhere despite similarities to the category in question. Following each excluded offence is the code referring to the category to which the excluded offence should be allocated.³³ For example, the exclusions under Trade or possession of protected or prohibited species of fauna and flora (1003) stipulate that theft of a pet is coded to 0502; offences against the treatment, raising or keeping of animals is coded to 10091; robbery of livestock is coded to 04014; and theft of livestock is coded to 05025.

Together, exclusions and inclusions assist in reinforcing mutual exclusiveness. They clarify boundaries between categories to ensure acts/events can be assigned to one category only.

Additional disaggregating variables

Disaggregating variables allow the recording of additional information about an offence that is necessary to understand the complexities of each individual offence, such as victim and perpetrator characteristics. Table A provides an overview of the minimum set of disaggregating variables that can be used to describe each individual crime act/event more fully or to describe perpetrator and victim attributes in more depth. The acronyms in front of each category title provide a shorthand description for coding these variables in crime records.

Most disaggregating variables (“tags”) will provide useful breakdowns only in relation to certain criminal offences. For example, the attempted/completed tag (At) does not apply to 0101 “intentional homicide” (as only completed intentional homicides are counted), nor to 0102 attempted homicide (as only attempted homicides are counted here), nor to 0103 non-intentional homicide (as this is, per definition, not attempted). However, for other crime types this or other disaggregating variables will provide policy-relevant information on certain crime characteristics:

- the Type of Weapon (We) tag distinguishes violent crime by the main categories of weapons used in the offence;

- the Situational Context (SiC) tag provides information on some significant types of criminal organizations involved in the crime;
- the Geographical location (Geo) tag enables the regional location of the crime within the country and identifies crimes recorded as “extraterritorial” crimes;
- the Date and Time (DaT) tag enables the exact identification of the date and time of the criminal offence (where known) and can be used to construct derived categories of interest (for example, burglaries occurring during a certain time period of the day);
- the Location of the Crime (Lo) tag collects data on crime locations by type and allows the identification of typical or common settings of crime such as the home or prisons;
- the Motive (Mo) tag highlights several particularly policy-relevant forms of motive for committing crime, particularly certain hate crimes in which the victim is specifically targeted because of their characteristics, attributes, beliefs or values;
- the Cybercrime-related (Cy) tag serves to identify various forms of crime committed with the use of a computer (for example, internet fraud, cyber-stalking or violation of copyright through electronic dissemination);
- the Reported by (Rep) tag allows the analysis of reporting channels of recorded crimes, such as whether certain crimes are frequently reported by victims or witnesses or more often detected by the police.

In addition, there are a number of self-explanatory victim and perpetrator disaggregations.

The relationship to other international classifications

With regard to offences causing physical harm or death, the ICCS is linked with the World Health Organization (WHO) International Classification of Diseases (ICD). The ICD is the long-standing standard diagnostic tool for epidemiology, health management and clinical purposes.³⁵ Within its structure, the ICD-10 provides a classification of external causes of morbidity and mortality (Chapter XX), and for the purposes of the ICCS, one of the most important categories is the group of causes considered as “Assault”, which is defined as “injuries inflicted by another person with intent to injure or kill, by any means”. In cases of death of victims of assault, the mortality cause is classified in the ICD-10 as an “Assault” and the statistical count of such deaths is often used to measure intentional homicides, and compared to criminal justice statistics for homicide counts.

In general terms, the definition of intentional homicide from the ICCS and the definition of deaths due to assault from ICD-10 do not contradict one another, since they both require the intentionality of the act and they both refer to the unlawfulness of the act (for example, the ICD-10 excludes killings deriving from legal interventions and operations of war). That said, some discrepancies between the two classifications do exist, mainly due to the ICCS providing more detailed descriptions of certain killings due to different levels of criminal liability of perpetrators. Such a discrepancy occurs, for example, in relation to killings in self-defence (included in “deaths due to assault” in ICD-10, while in the ICCS these are only considered “intentional homicide” in the case of excessive use of force in self-defence). In other cases, the ICCS provides a more detailed description of acts to include or exclude from the count of intentional homicide or other unlawful killings. For example, deaths due to the excessive use of force by law enforcement/state officials are included as intentional homicides in the ICCS, but not necessarily in the deaths by assault of ICD-10; similarly, certain killings in situations of war may be classified as “intentional homicide” or “unlawful killing associated with armed conflict” or as “war crimes” — depending on the circumstances — in the ICCS, while the relevant ICD-10 category makes no such distinction.

A detailed disaggregation of the category, “Assault”, is provided in ICD-10, which encompasses a wide variety of mechanisms that cause injury or death, and the ICCS adopts a consistent approach to build the additional disaggregation of intentional homicide by mechanism of killing (see Table V, which is based on ICD-10’s Assault group categories X85-Y09).

In addition to the ICD, the ICCS also makes reference to the International Standard Industrial Classification of All Economic Activities (ISIC), which is the international classification for productive activities, first developed by the Department of Economic and Social Affairs of the United Nations Secretariat in 1948 and revised in 2008. The ISIC is reflected in the disaggregating variables table of the ICCS to identify, by economic sector, businesses and institutions that are victim of a crime. This is particularly useful for identifying crimes against businesses, such as offences committed by employees or offences perpetrated by organized crime groups against businesses.

³⁵ The most recent version (ICD-10) came into use in 1994, while the 11th revision is currently under development.

	Homicide related to other criminal activities	Homicide related to robbery	Homicide may be perpetrated in order to accomplish the original crime and/or avoid detection. Homicide does not represent the primary goal of the criminal act
Interpersonal homicide ¹⁸³	Intimate partner/family member	Homicide perpetrated during the commission of another criminal offence	Homicide perpetrated by an intimate partner or family member according to the classification by relationship between victim and perpetrator. This includes homicide perpetrated by an (ex-) partner/(ex-)spouse, a family member other than a partner/spouse; infanticide and parricide
			Homicide perpetrated on persons other than intimate partners or family members. This includes, for example, killings related to neighbour disputes or property disputes, revenge-related killings, or random and seemingly unprovoked acts of killing ranging from brawls to killing sprees
Socio-political homicide	Other interpersonal homicide		Homicide as a result of violence against specific social groups, including hate crime (crime in which the victim is specifically targeted because of his or her characteristics, ascribed attributes, ascribed beliefs or values). Social prejudice is discrimination due to the victim's characteristics, attributes, beliefs or values. Characteristics and attributes include sex, gender, sexual orientation, age, language, ethnic origin, disability and/or race. Beliefs or values, at minimum, include religious beliefs and/or economic and social views
	Homicide related to social prejudice		Intentional homicide related to political agendas, including killings by terrorist groups with a political agenda, political assassination, and targeted killing of journalists for political reasons. A political agenda is a set of values, beliefs or issues that are advocated by a political or ideological organization
	Homicide related to political agendas		Intentional homicides in a situation of civil unrest
	Homicide related to civil unrest ¹⁸⁴		This includes, for example, homicide through mob violence and vigilantism, unlawful killings by the police, excessive use of force by law enforcement officers and extrajudicial killings
	Homicide related to other socio-political agendas

¹⁸² Intentional homicide committed in relation to other criminal activities that are aimed, directly or indirectly, at obtaining illicit profits.

¹⁸³ Homicide is a means of resolving a conflict and/or punishing the victim. It is not instrumental to the accomplishment of a secondary goal.

¹⁸⁴ Civil unrest refers to a situation of collective violent hostilities between two or more parties within a country that do not amount to an internal armed conflict.

Annex 1: Data comparability, reporting rates and counting rules

Three main factors affect the interpretation and comparability of administrative data on crime:

1. the way crime is defined and classified
2. the proportion of crime detected or reported to the authorities
3. the way crime is recorded and counted.

Defining and classifying crime

As explained earlier (see Introduction), administrative data on crime are usually compiled according to national legislations and concepts, which determines lack of international comparability. The application of the consistent set of definitions contained in the ICCS can ensure that data on crime within the same category will refer to the same underlying phenomenon (the same criminal act), irrespective of differences in national laws. The implementation of the ICCS at the national level will also improve, among other things, the comparison of state responses and trends over time for the same categories of crime.

Reporting and detecting crime

The interpretation and comparison of administrative data on crime are also affected by differences and changes in the portion of crime actually recorded by public authorities of the “total” crime that occurs over a period of time. For example, when examining data on police-recorded offences, it should always be kept in mind that the share of undetected and unrecorded crime (the “dark figure of crime”) is often substantial. Crime victimization surveys, which collect information on crime experienced by the target population, can provide information on the “real” prevalence of crime experienced within a certain population, including data on the percentage of crime reported to the police or other authorities. A common pattern found across victimization surveys is that reporting rates can vary substantially over time and between countries depending on factors such as the capacity of law enforcement authorities to respond to crime and the trust placed in them when reporting crime.

Recording and counting crime

The third major factor that affects the interpretation and comparability of crime statistics is the way that crimes are recorded and counted by different institutions and jurisdictions. For example, a national police institution that records an offence upon the completion of an investigation will typically record fewer crimes than another police institution recording and counting offences when it is first informed about the offence. The former police institution will in fact accumulate more evidence than an institution that records an offence during the initial stages of the investigation but, ceteris paribus, it will also record fewer crimes as many suspected criminal events may not turn out to be substantiated by the evidence.

In particular, the following elements will affect overall counts of crime and thus confound data comparisons across and within countries:

- the moment when data are collected for inclusion in crime statistics: Criminal justice institutions can collect data from different stages of their respective criminal justice process. For example, “input statistics” refer to data being collected at the time the offence is first reported to authorities; on the other hand, “output statistics” refer to data being collected after the offence has been investigated;
- the counting unit used in the statistics: typically, each criminal justice institution uses counting units based on its own operational requirements. Police may use charges, suspects, victims and incidents, while courts may use cases, convictions and sentences. Linking data across institutions would require the use of the same counting units (such as persons suspected and persons convicted);
- the application of a principal offence rule:¹⁸⁶ countries that apply the principal offence rule only record the most serious offence if simultaneous offences are committed; others record each offence separately, which results in a higher count of recorded crimes;¹⁸⁷
- the way in which an offence committed by more than one person is counted: depending on the counting unit, one unit of count can contain more than one perpetrator or victim. A court case may consist of multiple perpetrators but then be reported as one case, while the police may record each perpetrator rather than the case or committed offence;
- the way in which multiple offences are counted:¹⁸⁸ if one person is suspected of a series of homicides, they can be recorded as one homicide suspect or multiple homicide suspects.

Issues related to counting rules are not directly related to the definition and classification of crime per se and consequently are outside the scope of the ICCS. The ICCS thus does not provide direction on which counting rules are to be applied when collecting data. On the whole, experience shows that there is a wide variety of counting rules applied in the recording of crime and criminal justice data, which have often grown historically and are deeply ingrained in national recording systems. In some cases, the concrete application of counting rules depends on the technical capacity of data producers in recording and aggregating data. Countries that have to rely on paper-based crime records may face particular challenges in implementing complex counting rules. For these reasons, the harmonization of counting rules is best treated at a later stage and separately from the structure and application of the ICCS. UNODC aims to pursue further work related to counting rules and provide guidance on standards and good practices in this area. Pending widely agreed standards on the appropriate rules for recording and counting crime, it is imperative to provide exhaustive metadata on all crime and criminal justice data that facilitate their correct interpretation.

¹⁸⁶ “Principal offence rule” means that when more than one offence is committed simultaneously, only the most serious offence is recorded. For example, when it appears that a homicide and robbery have been committed simultaneously, under a principal offence rule, only the most serious offence (homicide) would be recorded.
